1 MEMORANDUM OF POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

2 I. INTRODUCTION

3 Defendant was a high-level executive at Wells Fargo who, for 4 years, ran what Wells Fargo called the "Community Bank" -- a banking 5 division that covered essentially all retail banking commonly 6 conducted at bank branches. Defendant oversaw the Community Bank, 7 including the sales goals for bank branch employees. Many employees 8 found these goals to be unrealistically high, and they began cheating 9 to meet the goals. The result is now a well-known scandal: Wells 10 Fargo opened millions of often unused accounts as employees tried to 11 game the system.

12 Eventually, reports of the scandal broke, prompting inquiries by 13 the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (the "OCC"), which 14 regulates banks. As head of the Community Bank, defendant was best 15 equipped to assist the OCC in rooting out the problems at Wells 16 Fargo. Instead, she prepared a memo that she knew the bank would 17 provide the OCC and corruptly withheld key information. In 18 particular, she withheld data on the number of employees who were 19 terminated or resigned pending investigation for sales-related 20 misconduct, and the fact that, of the many employees flagged by the 21 bank's own metrics for potential sales-related misconduct, only a 22 tiny percentage were investigated.

23 In connection with her efforts to mislead the OCC, and as part 24 of a binding plea agreement, defendant pleaded guilty to obstruction 25 of a bank examination, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1517. Consistent 26 with the Plea Agreement and PSR, the government agrees that the total 27 offense level is 12, defendant is in criminal history category I, and 28 the applicable Guidelines range is 10 to 16 months' imprisonment.

1 Consistent with the plea agreement, defendant should be 2 sentenced to twelve-months' imprisonment to be followed by one year
3 of supervised release. The United States Probation Office ("USPO"), 4 by contrast, recommends a three-year term of probation. Such a 5 sentence may reflect the fact that defendant poses no further danger 6 to society, but it does not account for the other statutory 7 sentencing factors. The sentence must reflect the seriousness of the 8 crime: defendant attempted to conceal from regulators one of the 9 biggest banking scandals in modern history. The sentence must afford 10 adequate deterrence: corporate wrongdoers must be sent a clear 11 message that maintaining a lucrative position through criminal 12 behavior is not worth the risk. And the sentence must promote 13 respect for the law: when top corporate executives commit crimes, 14 they should not be able to avoid prison because they are not at risk 15 of recidivism. A one-year custodial sentence strikes the right 16 balance.

17 II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

18 For years, Wells Fargo's Community Bank was plagued by 19 widespread employee misconduct. To meet onerous sales goals, 20 thousands of Wells Fargo employees engaged in unlawful or unethical 21 conduct. (PSR ¶ 14.) The misconduct varied widely. Some employees 22 would use customers' personal information without consent to open 23 accounts. Others would persuade customers to open accounts or other 24 financial products that employees knew were of no or little value to 25 the customer. (Id.) Employees would, for instance, open accounts 26 for friends and family members or encourage customers to open 27 duplicate checking or savings accounts or credit or debit cards.

1 (Id.) Between 2002 and 2016, millions of secondary accounts and 2 products were opened, many never used by customers. (Id.) Between 3 2011 and 2016, the Community Bank referred more than 23,000 employees 4 for investigation into potential sales-related misconduct and 5 terminated over 5,300 for customer-facing sales misconduct,
6 including, in many cases, for falsifying bank records. (Plea
7 Agreement ¶ 10.)

8 Defendant was the head of the Community Bank for nearly a decade 9 while this sales misconduct was occurring. (PSR ¶ 13.) She knew for 10 years there was sales-related misconduct within the Community Bank 11 and that employees were terminated each year for engaging in such 12 misconduct. (PSR ¶ 16.) She also knew employee terminations were 13 consistently increasing over time, that the misconduct was linked in 14 part to the Community Bank's sales goals, and that the termination 15 numbers likely underestimated the scope of the problem. (Id.; Plea
16 Agreement ¶ 10.)

17 In response to media coverage of the sales-related misconduct 18 occurring at Wells Fargo, the Community Bank created the Sales and 19 Service Conduct Oversight Team (the "Oversight Team") for, among 20 other reasons, the purported purpose of proactively identifying sales 21 misconduct. (Plea Agreement ¶ 10.) But the thresholds the Oversight 22 Team set for identifying sales misconduct was such that only the most 23 egregious conduct was flagged as potential misconduct warranting an 24 investigation. (Id.) Indeed, as of July 2014, the thresholds
25 established by the Oversight Team meant that the team investigated 26 only the top .01 to .05 percent of employees engaging in activity
27 considered a "red flag" for sales-related misconduct. (Id.)

1 Eventually, the OCC -- the U.S. agency tasked with ensuring that 2 banks operate in a safe and sound manner, among other things -- began 3 examining the Community Bank. But rather than aiding the OCC in its 4 examination by providing it with all the relevant information, 5 defendant obstructed the examination by seeking to minimize the scope 6 of the misconduct. (Plea Agreement ¶ 10.) In particular, defendant
7 prepared a memorandum she knew Wells Fargo would provide to the OCC.
8 (Id.) In it, she corruptly withheld statistics on the number of 9 employees who were terminated or resigned pending investigation for 10 sales-related misconduct. (Id.) She also failed to disclose that 11 the Oversight Team investigated an infinitesimal percentage of the 12 employees whose behavior raised red flags for sales practices
13 misconduct. (Id.)

14 In connection with her obstruction of the OCC's examination of 15 Wells Fargo and its sales-misconduct issues, defendant has pleaded 16 guilty pursuant to a plea agreement to obstructing a bank examination 17 in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1517. The parties entered into the plea 18 agreement pursuant to Rule 11(c)(1)(C) of the Federal Rules of 19 Criminal Procedure. (Plea Agreement ¶ 2.) The parties' agreed-upon 20 sentence, set forth in paragraph 14 of the Plea Agreement, is that 21 "an appropriate disposition of this case is that the Court impose a 22 sentence no higher than 16 months' imprisonment; up to three years'
23 supervised release with conditions to be fixed by the Court; a fine 24 of $100,000; and a $100 special assessment." (Plea Agreement ¶ 14.)

25 III. SENTENCING GUIDELINES

26 The government agrees with the offense-level computation set 27 forth in the PSR, which is consistent with the Plea Agreement. (PSR 28

1 ¶¶ 39-50; Plea Agreement ¶ 12.) In particular, the government agrees 2 that the total offense level is 12 based on a base offense level of 3 14 under USSG § 2J1.2(a) and a two-level decrease for acceptance of 4 responsibility under USSG § 3E1.1(a).

5 The government also agrees that defendant is in criminal history
6 category I. An offense level of 12 and a criminal history category
7 of I results in a Sentencing Guidelines range of 10 to 16 months' 8 imprisonment.

9 IV. ARGUMENT

10 If the sole consideration at sentencing were whether a custodial 11 sentence is necessary "to protect the public" from defendant's 12 "further crimes," the government would be joining the USPO in 13 recommending probation. 18 U.S.C. § 3553(a)(2)(C). Defendant is a 14 retired bank executive subject to a lifetime ban from the industry; 15 the government does not dispute that defendant poses no real risk of 16 recidivism. But that is not the only sentencing factor at play. Not 17 only must the sentence "reflect the seriousness of the offense," it 18 must also "promote respect for the law" and "afford adequate 19 deterrence." Id. § 3553(a)(2)(A), (B). The government stands by the 20 plea agreement, including its agreement that an appropriate 21 disposition is a sentence no higher than 16 months' imprisonment.
22 But a probationary sentence is not appropriate. A custodial sentence 23 of twelve months' imprisonment is.

24 A. The Seriousness of the Offense

25 Defendant attempted to hide from the OCC Wells Fargo's failure 26 to police the widespread misconduct that occurred under her watch.
27 And she did so as a highly compensated executive at one of the

1 world's largest financial institutions. In a vacuum, submitting a 2 misleading memo to regulators may not appear to be the most egregious 3 offense. But taken in context, it is a serious offense, one intended 4 to cover up the scope of one of the most significant banking scandals 5 of the century.

6 Large financial institutions like Wells Fargo are bedrocks of 7 the American economy. The OCC provides critical oversight and 8 supervision to ensure that they comply with applicable laws and 9 regulations to protect both customers and the economy as a whole.
10 Given the corporate structure and sprawling nature of a bank like 11 Wells Fargo, the OCC's ability to do its job depends on high-ranking 12 executives like defendant to be transparent and cooperative.
13 Corporations are notoriously difficult to investigate given their 14 compartmentalization, size, and involvement of corporate counsel.
15 See U.S. Justice Dep't, Justice Manual § 9-28.700 (2023). Absent the 16 candor and good faith of corporate insiders, misconduct can be very 17 difficult to uncover.

18 By the time the OCC got involved in this case, sales practices 19 misconduct under defendant was already widespread. As head of the 20 Community Bank, defendant was uniquely positioned to enable the OCC
21 to do its job. She did the opposite. Defendant minimized the scope 22 of the misconduct, falsely characterizing it as the isolated 23 misbehavior of a few bad apples.

24 In an effort to downplay the severity of defendant's conduct, 25 her counsel pointed to the fact that lawyers were involved in 26 defendant's preparation of the memorandum to the OCC that omitted 27 critical information and that the "OCC had access to virtually any 28

1 internal Bank information it wanted, including . . . the information
2 omitted from the memorandum.” (PSR ¶ 33.) Neither of these facts
3 diminishes defendant’s culpability. As the leader of the Community
4 Bank, defendant was both most familiar with the facts and responsible 5 for conveying that information truthfully to lawyers. And she admits 6 that she intentionally omitted information in an effort to “minimize 7 the scope of the sales practices misconduct issue.” (Plea Agreement 8 ¶ 10.) The imprimatur of attorneys who had an incomplete picture is 9 not a mitigating factor. Nor does the OCC’s access to internal bank 10 documents render defendant’s offense any less serious. Regulators 11 and other investigators should be able to rely on information that 12 executives prepare and/or present to them without having to resort to 13 combing through tens of millions of documents to ensure they are 14 getting the full story. If anything, the peripheral involvement of 15 lawyers and the difficulty in reviewing innumerable records is simply 16 a reminder of how insidious corporate wrongdoing often is.

17 Historically, Congress has been particularly concerned with the 18 fact that “white collar offenders . . . frequently do not receive 19 sentences that reflect the seriousness of their offenses.” S. Rep.
20 No. 98-255, at 77 (1983), reprinted in 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3182, 3260.
21 This is a common refrain over the course of decades. In the 1980s, 22 Congress sought to correct “historical patterns” for “white collar 23 offenses for which plainly inadequate sentences have been imposed in 24 the past.” Id. at 116. In 2002, when debating the Sarbanes-Oxley 25 Act, one senator discussed the need for “strong disciplinary action 26 against executives who break the law” and argued that “executives who 27 destroy the dreams of investors by irresponsible and unethical

1 behavior will be given the severe punishment they deserve." 148
2 Cong. Rec. S7350-04, S7355 (July 25, 2002) (statement of Sen. Mike 3 Enzi) (mentioning). Part of Sarbanes-Oxley even directed the 4 Sentencing Commission to enhance "fraud and obstruction of justice 5 sentences" to ensure that the sentencing guidelines for "obstruction 6 of justice are sufficient to deter and punish that activity."
7 Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, § 805(a), Pub. L. No. 107-204, 116 Stat.
8 745 (2002). In light of this legislative history, it is clear that 9 Congress viewed non-custodial sentences as inadequate in cases like 10 this one involving obstruction.

11 Nor is this a case where defendant's dishonesty had no real-12 world consequence. It mattered. The Los Angeles Times was reporting 13 on sales misconduct at Wells Fargo by the fall of 2013 (PSR ¶ 17), 14 but the scandal was not fully brought to light until several years 15 later in September 2016, when several settlements made public the 16 full scope of the sales practices misconduct within the Community
17 Bank. Aside from the settlements themselves, which included a $3 18 billion payment as part of its deferred prosecution agreement with 19 the government (PSR ¶ 9 n.1.), Wells Fargo had to deal with the 20 public fallout among politicians and investors. Had defendant been 21 diligent in investigating the misconduct and forthright with 22 regulators, the result for Wells Fargo and its shareholders may have 23 been less severe.

1 B. Ensuring General Deterrence and Promoting Respect for the 2 Law

3 Defendant's crime must also be met with a sentence sufficient to 4 offer general deterrence and promote respect for the law. Defendant 5 had strong economic incentives to protect her job by concealing the 6 wrongdoing that occurred on her watch. As the PSR makes clear, 7 defendant was highly compensated. Upon retirement, she left Wells
8 Fargo with roughly $125 million in stock, options, and restricted 9 shares, though more than half of that money was subsequently clawed 10 back. (PSR ¶¶ 19, 36.) This figure does not include the millions of 11 dollars in cash compensation defendant was paid each year as head of 12 the Community Bank. (PSR ¶ 104.) Faced with an OCC investigation 13 into the sales misconduct scandal, defendant prioritized keeping her 14 lucrative position over candor and transparency. It is 15 understandable that executives want to do what it takes to keep their 16 jobs and protect their reputations. But the penalty for this type of 17 criminal conduct must be sufficient to overcome that impulse even 18 when the stakes are high.

19 Many corporate executives, like defendant, who are compensated 20 millions of dollars a year may be tempted to deceive regulators or 21 skirt the truth with their boards of directors in an effort to keep 22 their high-paying jobs -- whether to cover up deficiencies in their 23 own performance or to hide malfeasance that occurred on their watch.
24 If probation is viewed as the likely outcome, executives may decide 25 that obstructing an investigation is worth the risk if it means 26 potentially maintaining their lucrative roles. In fact, in drafting 27 § 3553, Congress was in part addressing the concern that "[m]ajor 28

1 white collar criminals often are sentenced to . . . little or no
2 imprisonment," which the offenders disregard as "a cost of doing
3 business." S. Rep. No. 98-255 at 76, 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 3259. A 4 prison sentence best serves the goal of general deterrence. See 5 "Penalties for White Collar Offenses: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on 6 Crime and Drugs of the S. Comm. on the Judiciary," 107th Cong. 104 7 (2002) (statement of James B. Comey, Jr., United States Attorney for 8 the Southern District of New York) ("We begin with the principle that 9 the certainty of real and significant punishment best serves the 10 purposes of deterring white collar criminals [I]f it is 11 unmistakable that the automatic consequence for one committing a 12 significant white collar offense is prison, then many will be 13 deterred.").

14 Nor is deterring corporate crime simply a matter of 15 counteracting the massive financial rewards corporate wrongdoers 16 seek. For a punishment to afford adequate deterrence, it must 17 account not only for those incentives, but also the likelihood a 18 defendant will be caught. See, e.g., Gary S. Becker, "Crime and 19 Punishment: An Economic Approach," 76 J. Pol. Econ. 169, 184 (1968).
20 Given the difficulty in uncovering corporate wrongdoing, particularly 21 given the layers of insulation enjoyed by the upper echelons of a 22 major publicly traded company, the need for a guideline sentence is 23 all the greater. A custodial sentence ensures the expected value of 24 the prospective punishment outweighs the lucrative payoffs future 25 wrongdoers would hope to obtain even when discounted by the odds of 26 being caught.

27

28

1 Public trust in the criminal justice system requires that 2 corporate executives face appropriate consequences for their actions.
3 The perception that white-collar criminals, particularly well-paid, 4 well-educated executives like defendant, often get no more than a 5 "slap on the wrist" is corrosive to the system's legitimacy. A 6 twelve-month term of imprisonment in this case would promote respect 7 for the law. Such a sentence would send the message that highly 8 compensated corporate executives -- particularly those, like 9 defendant, who are responsible for overseeing and operating a 10 federally insured bank -- are held accountable for their actions as 11 much as any other member of society. Again, in enacting § 3553(a), 12 Congress was worried that "a category of major white collar criminals 13 too frequently was sentenced to probation or too short a term of 14 imprisonment because judges using the old rehabilitation theory of 15 sentencing, did not believe such offenders needed to be rehabilitated 16 and, therefore, saw no need for incarceration." S. Rep. No. 98-255, 17 at 177, 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 3360. As Third Circuit Judge Stephanos
18 Bibas has reflected, "Although economists may focus on ex ante 19 deterrence, judges may prefer to look ex post at the sympathetic, 20 white, educated offender who reminds judges of themselves and seems 21 to pose no danger." Stephanos Bibas, "White-Collar Plea Bargaining 22 and Sentencing After Booker," 47 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 721, 724 (2005).
23 "Allowing these offenders to escape imprisonment, however, is 24 inequitable and undercuts the law's deterrent and moral message 25 condemning white-collar crime." Id.

26 Finally, while the disclosed recommendation letter correctly
27 evaluates defendant's risk of recidivism and need for rehabilitation, 28

1 it misapplies some of the remaining sentencing factors. In 2 particular, the letter references defendant's respect for the law and 3 the need to deter her future crimes. (CR 31, at 3, 5.) But neither 4 of these factors are solely or even principally concerned with the 5 individual defendant. Indeed, as Congress explained in connection 6 with § 3553(a), "to deter others from committing the offense . . . is 7 particularly important in the area of white collar crime." S. Rep.
8 No. 98-255 at 76, 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 3259 (emphasis added). When 9 considering all the sentencing factors together, a non-custodial 10 sentence is simply inappropriate.

11 C. Defendant's Risk of Recidivism and Mitigating Factors

12 As stated earlier, there is no dispute that defendant poses a 13 minimal risk of recidivism, and a lengthy prison sentence is not 14 necessary to protect society. The Sentencing Commission has recently 15 proposed amending the Sentencing Guidelines to reduce the guideline 16 sentences for "zero-point offenders," i.e., defendants who did not 17 receive any criminal history points and meet various other criteria.
18 U.S. Sentencing Commission, Amendments to the Sentencing Guidelines 19 (Preliminary) (Apr. 5, 2023), § 4C1.1(a), available at 20 https://www.ussc.gov/sites/default/files/pdf/amendment-
21 process/reader-friendly-amendments/20230405_prelim-RF.pdf. In 22 proposing this amendment, the Commission was explicit in its 23 reasoning: "offenders with zero criminal history points . . . have 24 considerably lower recidivism rates than other offenders." Id.
25 Although this guideline is not expected to be in effect by the time 26 of defendant's sentencing -- and, in any event, the parties agreed in 27 the binding Plea Agreement not to argue that any other departures be

1 imposed beyond what is already in the Plea Agreement -- the Court can 2 consider this factor under § 3553(a). If the proposed amendment were 3 applicable, defendant's guideline range would be six to twelve 4 months' imprisonment. The government's proposed sentence of twelve-5 months' imprisonment accounts for the fact that defendant is a "zero-6 point offender" and the reduced guideline range that would apply if 7 USSG § 4C1.1 were in effect.¹

8 Additionally, defendant has been the subject of civil sanctions
9 as well as the criminal ones she now faces. Wells Fargo clawed back 10 over $65 million in stock options. Defendant has agreed to 11 settlements with the OCC and the SEC involving collective civil 12 penalties of more than $21 million. And she is barred, per the terms 13 of her OCC settlement from working again in the banking sector. (PSR 14 ¶ 36.) These civil remedies themselves provide some deterrence 15 independent of the criminal penalty in this case and further support 16 the conclusion that a sentence higher than twelve months is not 17 required here.

18 Defendant's background offers other mitigating factors. She 19 suffers from some health issues, for example, and has a long history 20 of giving back to her community. Mitigating factors such as these 21 explain in part why the government agrees an above-guideline sentence 22 is excessive and further confirm that she poses no real risk of 23 recidivism.

25
26 ¹ Barring intervention from Congress, it is the government's 27 understanding that the Sentencing Commission intends to make this 28 two-level reduction retroactive. Accordingly, to the extent the Court considers the proposed amendment in sentencing defendant, the government requests that it do so explicitly on the record.

1 V. CONCLUSION

2 A twelve-month term of imprisonment strikes the correct balance.
3 Such a sentence reflects the seriousness of defendant's conduct, 4 promotes respect for the law, provides just punishment, and affords 5 general deterrence to other executives who might find themselves 6 tempted to skirt the truth. At the same time, it acknowledges that 7 defendant has accepted responsibility for her offense and does not 8 pose a continuing danger to the public. And it does so while 9 avoiding unwarranted sentencing disparities the guidelines were 10 designed to avoid. See Gall v. United States, 552 U.S. 38, 54
11 (2007).

12 For the foregoing reasons, the government respectfully requests 13 that this Court sentence defendant to twelve months' imprisonment; 14 one year of supervised release under the terms and conditions the 15 USPO set forth in conditions one and four through eight in its 16 recommendation letter (ECF 31 at 1-2); a fine of $100,000; and a $100
