It's fine. I'm glad you did because despite his repeated disturbing behavior and acts, I still feel bad for him. To be reminded multiple times DAILY that he's smearing me for ... asking him not to sexually or emotionally harass me? For making his movie better? For calling in all the favors to turn out all the biggest musicians and entertainers to contribute to making his movie better? To leading a marketing campaign for free? I literally don't know a single thing I've done that he can smear me about. Ryan says he should be writing me apology and thank you letters every day. And instead he chooses to make a monster outta me ... but what's my crime. I've only ever stayed focused on the work and given him EVERY opportunity to make it better. And he just keeps behaving like a rabid pig

Exactly. I think as women and mothers we're taught to give grace until there's nothing left of us, but in times like these sometimes it's good to be reminded that grace is wonderful until it compromises your integrity. I sometimes start to feel bad too but I can guarantee you he hasn't felt an ounce of guilt. He's too busy playing victim while you work your ass off to make a better movie that he gets credit for.

But as your friend, I don't want to interrupt your peace, I hate it when people tell me negative things people say and I try not to do it to others. I want to be a sage space.

Safe space. But sage works too 😊

I wish his agent knew that this is entirely about Justin. Not that it matters. But it hurts my feelings for me, and infuriates me as someone who has been held within your immense strength, that she would say to your face that it's me and not you asking for what's right and fair.

She texted it. If she said it to my face she would have gotten clocked. Instead she got blocked.

Between your text and the letter I just got from Lisa the post production supervisor, my heart is full. And they can distract from that, but they can't take that
